Excerpt: . . . about to cross such a point in the street must take notice of the uneven surface and declivities, and use such care as the situation would suggest to an ordinarily prudent person. Lincoln v. Detroit, 101 Mich. 245, 59 N. W. 617. In the above case Keves v. Marcellus. 50 Mich. 441, 45 Am. Rep! 52, 15 N. W. 542, supra, IX. , c, 3, (b), (3); was distinguished upon the ground that the street considered in that case in which the defect existed was little more than a country highway; and it was held that it accommodated the public travel conveniently and safely. But whether leaving a manhole with a cover projecting several inches above the surface of the ground, nearly in the middle of a street, is an obstruction to travel, is a question of fact for the jury, in an action...
