Exclamo finale fictor adest male fictus-f adulter Verus eram coniunx: me perfida teste teneris. So M: a fact which I would specially signalize, as it proves beyond a doubt that M is not an invariably safe guide. Ovid is telling how Cephalus, distrusting his wife Procris fidelity, absented himself from his home, then returning in a disguise solicited her for a long time in vain. Still incredulous he offers larger and larger presents, till at last she is on the point of yielding. Then Cephalus throwing off his disguise proclaims himself her husband, not her paramour. Ms promitto is of course wrong; we need not doubt the reading of most Mss pro node. Whether loquendo is right is less clear; locando which Heinsius found in one MS is perhaps possible in the sense of stipulating. But the words introduced by Exclamo are, I think, fixable, and, if I am not mistaken, have hitherto not been rightly edited. The excellent Canonici vn gives male fictor adest, ego fictus adulter, two Bodleian MSS F. Iv. 31 and DOrville x. 1. 5. 24 mala (mea DO. ) pectora detego fictus (tectus DO. ) adulter, in which the same reading is obscurely conveyed, with one difference of some importance, mala for male. Hence I would restore Mala, fictor adest; ego fictus adulter Verus eram coniunx: Vile one, it is a dissembler you see: I who dissemble adulterer was all the time your real husband....
